CONFERENCE AGENDA

Immunology is a rapidly developing field that has markedly stimulated many other fields. Developments such as monoclonal antibodies, cloning of functional lymphocytes, description of structure and function of a variety of growth factors and molecular biology of rearranging genes (immunoglobins and T cell receptors) have influenced rapid progress for instance in cell biology, molecular biology, developmental biology or neurobiology. In addition, modern immunology has begun to make major contributions in clinical medicine.

This conference will draw together investigators who share a multidisciplinary interest in immunology. Their backgrounds are in cell biology of immunocytes, molecular biology of the immune responses, embryonic development of the immune system, recapitulation of the immune system after bone marrow transplantation or T lymphotropic viruses. Each of the topics is in the forefront of very active investigation and is chaired by a distinguished lecturer who has been instrumental in recent development. Through the mechanisms of lecture, posters, informal discussions and workshops, we propose to facilitate knowledge and technical exchange in modern immunology.
